Apparently, I struck a period where a comma was intended. Let me set it straight: "So, until Friday, we have a sort of informal stand-down conditioned on receipt of an offer then, if it is the seed of a resolution, my client has then authorized me to agree to a one-month stand down." I think that the meaning was probably clear even if the dreaded autocorrect had healed the one sentence into two oddly-phrased sentences. In short, the month would be conditioned on having an agreement in hand but we can wait until Friday for that agreement. Because we both agreed that the stand down had to be in place before we negotiated the agreement, we will do nothing until Friday.

Subject: Your Proposal

Paul,

My client is interested in listening to your client's offer, but because, to date, we have been long promised an offer, but have never seen one, the client would like to see at least the promised outline on Friday, as we discussed, and then would agree to the stand-down if the offer appears to be, at least, a start toward resolution. So, until Friday, we have a sort of informal stand-down conditioned on receipt of an offer then. If it is the seed of a resolution, my client has then authorized me to agree to a one-month stand down. I would imagine this is entirely consistent with the objectives we discussed over the phone with the sole change that it is conditioned upon actual receipt of the offer.

Please let me know if you would be willing to move forward with this as a working plan at this point.

My sincere thanks,

Mark L. Lorbiecki
